I. About This Bibliography

A. General Scope

Multiculturalism in Libraries is divided into four sections. This first section will describe the general scope of this bibliography and discuss contributions of cognate fields to this subject. Section II will list information sources related to the philosophy and movement of multiculturalism, as well as a few general guides to this subject. This will be followed by listings of multicultural periodicals and websites.

Section III will guide librarians new to this subject on how to begin research on ethnic groups unfamiliar to them. The most extensive part of this bibliography, Section IV will list resources on multiculturalism in libraries, with an emphasis on the following:

- Administration and Program Planning
- Staff Recruitment, Mentoring, and Management
- Teaching
- Collection Development, Acquisitions, and Cataloging

While some sources in this bibliography will be very useful, regardless of the ethnic groups served, the emphasis here will be on service to people of color in the U.S., including African Americans, Asian Americans, Latinos, and Native Americans. Serious attempts were made to list all handbooks on service to specific groups, as well as all materials on librarians of color because this material is scattered and sometimes difficult to find. It is also important to represent views of ethnic librarians as they serve their own communities, as well as the public, at large. While some excellent materials from library science and education have been listed about teaching diverse groups, they have been supplemented with a few titles describing in more detail educational issues related to each group, as well as appropriate teaching strategies. It is hoped that the resources presented here will be very useful to all librarians, especially those serving ethnic groups new to them.

B. Contributions From Other Professions

While most of the professional literature in this bibliography is from library science, materials from education, management and marketing, and social work were included, as well. Books on multicultural education are useful in a number of ways. Educators have done more research and thinking on the history and philosophy of multiculturalism, as a phenomenon than have researchers in other fields. Educators are also concerned with learning styles of people from different cultures, effective teaching strategies, and curriculum development. Books published on educators of color, particularly on the college level supplement and reinforce points made in the management literature to be described below. Since most librarians are either formal educators (in school or academic libraries), or informal educators (in public libraries), and since most also increasingly instruct the public on how to use information, this materials would be very germane.

For a long time, much research on cultural diversity in library science have focused on recruitment of people of color to the field, but more recently there has been much more information on managing diverse groups in the workplace. Quite a few books have been published on librarians of color. Almost all of the earlier ones were mostly on African Americans, but more recent publications have focused on librarians from all minority groups. Most of these books have consisted of relatively anecdotal interviews, but the same issues seem to be repeatedly mentioned. More systematic book-length studies have been done in management on the experiences and concerns of managers of color in the corporate world. Their concerns, problems, and proposed solutions echo those of librarians and of teachers and other professionals. Especially important is the work of John Fernandez, who has published several books on women and all minorities in the workplace since the early 1980s. His books tend to be on one of three themes: problems encountered by minorities and women in the workplace, how companies can and should manage a diverse workforce, and how minorities and women can succeed in the workplace. Several of his most relevant titles are listed here, as well as titles by other business authors, and some similar titles on educators.

While the general multicultural library handbooks do an excellent job of describing steps that librarians should take to successfully reach new groups of users, several texts from library science and other fields discuss outreach in more depth and from different points of view. One library science text describes successful techniques in approaching community gatekeepers who may be very influential in encouraging other community members to use libraries. Most of these gatekeepers are experts on organizations, events, and trends that affect their communities and can be of great help to librarians. A social work text, which is listed in this bibliography describes both interviewing and surveying techniques that may or may not work with a number of groups. It also looks at the field of social work as an “ethnic group”. Books on marketing to ethnic groups in the US, as well as some international marketing books have fascinating information on what attracts people from diverse groups to products or services, or in some unfortunate circumstances repel them. One of these books is also listed in this bibliography.

Library science materials on services to diverse groups tend to be published in cycles. The last major wave of book publishing on this subject was in the early 1990s. It is hoped that including materials from other fields will not only mention and expand on some subjects not discussed as much in library science, but will also reflect early and more recent trends in this area.

IV. Multiculturalism in Libraries

A. Services and Programs

International Perspectives

It is very useful for librarians who work with recent immigrants to be aware of library and book trends, developments, and issues in the home country. This can affect library programming in general and collection development in particular. Checking library literature under the name of the “home country” or region is one way to begin to learn more about the needs of new immigrants. These sources can also add some helpful historical perspectives.

D. Collection Development, Acquisitions, and Cataloging

Library review media, jobbers, and other traditional collection development strategies used in our field can be compared to the flesh-colored band-aids and crayons of an earlier era, none of these things were designed with the needs of diverse people in mind. It has often been necessary to work “outside of the box” and “color outside the lines” to build good collections serving previously underrepresented groups. Librarians collecting for ethnic minorities and for recent immigrants have ordered from international, multicultural, or ethnic bookstores and jobbers in the U.S. and abroad, attended book fairs, and gone on buying trips abroad, where necessary to acquire needed materials. This bibliography also points to some other useful strategies for busy librarians. Important starting points are the handbooks and guides and library literature and review media listed in this section. For more retrospective and historical collection development, the bibliographies in Section IIIB can be very useful. This section also includes a lengthy list of important library collections around the country for several reasons. The catalogs of these collections, even where they are combined with more general catalogs can be checked for specific titles and for titles on certain subjects. In preparing this bibliography, I found it useful to use HELIN to clarify my subject headings, and then do subject searching in places like the Mashantucket Pequot Museum Research Libraries, the Queens Borough Public Library, and the MELVYL catalog of the U. of California. Last, library catalogs of ethnic and multicultural materials can also be very useful sources of cataloging information.
